

REDI Announces Position Open for Part-Time Executive Director

April 2, 2009

The Renewable Energy Development Institute (REDI) is a Willits-based 501c3 charitable, educational and scientific organization started in 1989 with the primary goal of encouraging widespread use of renewable energy for the public benefit. Current programs include the Home Energy Link Program (HELP), an energy efficiency program for small business, hands-on workshops, energy awareness education, Solar Club research and a sustainable demonstration house.

Through numerous partnerships, REDI has helped to craft national and statewide (California) policies to encourage widespread use of renewables and has developed marketing programs and materials to increase consumer awareness and purchases of renewable energy systems. REDI has conducted many educational workshops and demonstration projects, and has organized major events involving all aspects of renewables technologies. This small grassroots organization has been able to multiply these efforts through an informal network of volunteers and expert advisors for a cumulative influence and effective impact.

The ideal candidate has excellent organizing and networking abilities; oral and written communication skills; experience with fiscal control, management oversight, and general administration; computer proficiency; and supports REDI's mission. Working well with others is essential. Knowledge of renewable energy sector is desirable but not required. Compensation is negotiable. Potential is unlimited. The successful candidate will enjoy beautiful Mendocino County, California, and the company of people committed to renewable energy while collaborating on interesting and timely projects.

REDI's mission is to develop energy conservation, energy efficiency, and renewable energy for public benefit.

"REDI links people and places to renewable energy."
